PITTSBURGH PRESS CLUB

Its Origin and Progress

IN the Spring of 1881, thirty-three years ago, the newspaper workers of Pittsburgh met in Common Council Chamber, Municipal Hall, and organized the PITTSBURGH PRESS CLUB. The primary object of the meeting and organization was the very apparent necessity of taking care of the newspaper men of inadequate means who were stricken with illness, and to see that those who died were decently buried. This was a most laudable field for concerted action, and a decision was reached that a press club would be useful to the community in many ways. Many men of prominence in the newspaper world of Pittsburgh were active in the organization of the new club. Among these were the late John N. Neeb, William Ramsey, William Smythe and H. W. Neeb. Its first president was Mr. C. N. Shaw, at that time City Editor of the "Dispatch". It is gratifying to note that Mr. H. A. Neeb, who has the distinction of being the only original officer of the Club now living, and who was its first treasurer, is often seen in the rooms, discussing the current topics of the day, or speaking reminiscently of the dead and living members of the profession.

The first quarters of the Club consisted of rooms on the third floor of No. 408 Smithfield Street. After some little time these rooms were given up, and the Club maintained a somewhat feeble and absolutely homeless existence for another year. In the meantime, the number of men employed on newspapers in Pittsburgh had greatly increased, and the necessity for organization was seen to be greater than ever before. In 1885, a second general meeting of newspapermen of the city was called and held in the Common Council Chamber. The result of this meeting was a decision in favor of a Club, and the charter of the PITTSBURGH PRESS CLUB was applied for and granted.

For a number of years the Club occupied comfortable quarters at No. 406 Penn Avenue. Subsequently the organization was housed at the corner of Sixth Avenue and Cherry Alley, the present location of the Public Safety Building; on Sixth Avenue near Smithfield Street; on Smithfield Street, below Sixth Avenue; at 510 Smithfield Street, where three floors of the Park Hotel building were occupied. It was then decided to seek more modern and up-to-date quarters, and a pleasant suite of rooms, on the fourth floor of the Nixon Theater Building, was secured, which was the home of the Club for three years. Early in 1911 a larger suite, on the ninth floor of the newly completed May Building, was leased; but after one year's occupancy, the increased membership made larger quarters necessary, and the Club leased for a term of years, the entire eighth floor of the May Building, Fifth and Liberty Avenues, its present quarters.

Since obtaining its charter, the PITTSBURGH PRESS CLUB has never closed its doors, and is now the oldest press club of continuous existence in the country. The house is open day and night, to receive members and visiting newspaper men. This is a great convenience to visitors, arriving in our city at any hour of the twenty-four, and is a necessity so far as our resident members are concerned, owing to the different hours in which they are employed. Those working on afternoon papers can avail themselves of the privileges of the Club during the day or evening; but the men on the morning papers can only find time for rest and recreation after the paper goes to press, which is "After Thirty."

It has always been a dignified club and has maintained and fostered the traditions of the best school of journalism, according to both old and modern standards. It is a semi-public institution that seeks to bring into social contact the man who makes the news with the man who gathers it.

Among its members are men who have passed from the newspaper field into higher business, professional and public life, and who have attained not only local and national reputation, but have reached international prominence. On the list of members of the Club who began their literary careers in Pittsburgh are to be found the names of many leading cartoonists, playwrights, magazine writers and authors of to-day.

Under the administration of Thomas J. Keenan as President the International League of Press Clubs was organized, over fifteen years ago. The PITTSBURGH PRESS CLUB thus became responsible for one of the greatest forward movements in journalism.

The present quarters of the Club are located in the center of the commercial and financial district; and convenient to all city and interurban lines of travel. The rooms, a few of which are herein illustrated, are well arranged to meet the requirements of a club of this character.

Bohemia Hall

In the directors' room is a choice collection of photographs and crayon portraits of prominent men and women in the dramatic and musical world; a bequest made to the Club by the late Major Montooth.

In "Bohemia Hall" are given the many entertainments which have made this Club a factor in the city's social life. During the season several "Ladies' Nights" are given, at which an excellent entertainment is furnished for the families and friends of members.

Last year the Club inaugurated the policy of giving each year, to approximately one hundred poor children, a Christmas Party. On the afternoon of December 23, 1913, the children were entertained in the large assembly room, which was artistically decorated with festoons of oak and holly leaves, and myriads of multi-colored incandescent lights; the stage being set with an illuminated tree and surrounding landscape. After the dinner was served, the tree was disclosed, and the distribution of presents followed. These consisted of several pieces of serviceable clothing, a toy or doll, fruit, candy, etc. The children were served by a corps of ladies who volunteered for the service; either wives and sisters of members, or ladies interested in the Kindergarten Association, which organization furnished the children not secured through the personal investigation of members. To meet the expense of this entertainment, no subscriptions were solicited outside the Club membership, and the "Children's Christmas Party" is considered an established institution by the PITTSBURGH PRESS CLUB.

HEINZ, HENRY J., manufacturer, is the son of Henry and Anna M. Heinz. He was educated in the public schools and during his boyhood days, when not in school, assisted his father, who was engaged in brick-making and contracting. As the boy grew to manhood, the father came to depend almost entirely upon the son in the management of the little contracting business. At length he was taken in as a partner, and upon the suggestion of the son, a market garden was added to the contracting business. This soon became the most profitable enterprise of the two, and in 1869 the son started a modest business of packing horseradish. This was the origin of the H. J. Heinz Company, of which Mr. Heinz is now president.

Mr. Heinz's home in the East End, which contains a fine library and many collections of quaint and interesting relics, is one of the show places of Pittsburgh. While Mr. Heinz belongs to the Duquesne, Union, Country and Press Clubs, he devotes less time to amusements than do most business men. Much of his time is devoted to charitable and religious work, and nowhere is he more at home than among the boys and girls of his Sunday School. Rarely does he miss a session, and is always thoroughly familiar with the subject under discussion for the day. He carries his religion, as taught in Church and Sunday School, into the office and factory on week days; and libraries, bath houses of the most sanitary type, lunch rooms, and a large swimming pool are maintained in his North Side plant, free to all employees.

As the future of the steel business in St. Louis was not very promising, and Western Pennsylvania offering decided advantages in this line, Mr. Rowe, with his former associates, came to the Pittsburgh district in search of a desirable location. They organized the Braddock Wire Company, and Mr. Rowe became treasurer and general manager of the new company. The work of building the new plant was placed in the hands of the young manager, and he soon had a prosperous plant in operation at Rankin, Pa. His work was so satisfactory that when the Braddock Wire Company was merged into the Consolidated Steel & Wire Company of Chicago, Mr. Rowe was placed in charge of all the business of the new company in Pennsylvania. He was active in the organization of the American Steel & Wire Company, with which the Consolidated Steel & Wire Company was merged; and in 1901 this company was absorbed by the United States Steel Corporation. He remained with the corporation for a time, but finally disposed of his holdings, and organized the Pittsburgh Steel Company, of which he became the president. He is also president of the Pittsburgh Steel Products Company; vice-president of the Pittsburgh Ice Company and director of the Duquesne National Bank.
